Propane is also referred to as liquefied petroleum gas, often shortened to “LP gas” or “LPG”. It’s an alternative fuel that’s a byproduct of natural gas processing and petroleum refining. It’s safe, clean, powerful, and reliable—and it’s powering homes and businesses all over the world.

You’ve seen propane tanks at your favorite hardware store, and have probably used them to grill up some tasty food at a summer barbecue. But have you ever wondered how propane is made?

Propane is a fossil fuel that’s found naturally, alongside natural gas and oil. Propane is separated from natural gas during processing, often using refrigeration—so contrary to popular belief, propane isn’t made from natural gas but is extracted from it.

Propane is an extremely versatile fuel that is useful in a wide variety of applications. Home propane is commonly used for home heat, cooking, and water heat, especially in rural areas where natural gas isn’t available. Since propane grill tanks are portable, efficient, and powerful, they’re often used in your favorite outdoor spaces for the staple braai grilling, for patio heating and lighting, pool and spa heat, and outdoor kitchens. Camping, tailgating, and RV adventures wouldn’t be complete without a portable propane cylinder for heating, cooking, and powering insect traps!
